Pincher Creek SAR routinely performs a critique after a Search and Rescue incident in order to learn what should be done differently or the same in the next similar incident. Critiques are not about criticism but rather about learning. They are normally chaired by a Search Manager that was not involved in the incident. The suggestions that are brought forward through the critique process are presented in this report.

The suggestions are being passed on to the indicated organizations/committees for their consideration. We recognize that not all suggestions may be appropriate, and some may already have been implemented.

	Strategy: New S.O.P.: All searchers attending an incident are expected to be well rested enough to perform for one operational period. Under normal circumstances no searcher should be on duty for two operational periods in a row and searchers will have at least 6 hours sleep before returning to duty. Under exceptional circumstances it is the responsibility of the overhead team to evaluate for each searcher how long it has been since they've rested, how intense has their day been, and how can risks be mitigated.
